by. The present invention relates to alarm systems and in particular to an alarm signal control panel having a fast attack capability, to an alarm system using such a panel, and a method for controlling such an alarm system. Banks, hotels, offices, public buildings, and the like have alarm systems which monitor various events and activate certain devices in response to the event. Such systems generally comprise a central control panel with various display devices for displaying information regarding the status of each system sensor and the status of the control panel itself. One of the typical displays is a graphical display which includes a map of the geographical area in which the sensors are located. The central control panel also includes a display which is used to display information regarding the status of each sensor, such as temperature. The central control panel generally has a fast attack capability. That is, the central control panel can generate an alarm signal for each sensor in response to the occurrence of a particular event within a time limit. For example, a control panel might generate an alarm signal within thirty seconds. In the past, control panels such as the central control panel of the type described above were generally run from a bank of batteries. Under ordinary operation, the batteries were continuously connected to the system power source. When a sensor event occurred, the battery was disconnected from the system power supply and the control panel generated an alarm signal for the sensor. Such a prior control panel was typically only fast attack capable to the extent that the batteries were exhausted. A typical control panel would be recharged and used until it was again exhausted.
