What's New in the Photoshop EXpress?

Edmund Blackadder was by no means a typical shopkeeper. He was a well-educated, impeccably dressed man with aspirations to be a Member of Parliament. However, on his death, the shambles of the home he left for his widow and son fell upon Edmund's cousin, Lord Blackadder. Blackadder began his career with a position in the War Office and was later promoted to Under-Secretary for State. Though he was unqualified for the post, he was still a favourite of Queen Victoria because he had, in the past, made her laugh. He believed the people of Britain to be frivolous and he was therefore unable to see their potential. A political correspondent first describes Queen Victoria describing her beloved Edmund as "a cross between "the Hon. George Bush and the Hon. James Buchanan" and says that in Edmund's view "a cake was a cake and not the body of a Welsh woman, and that a tooth-brush was something you put up in the bed after one had gone to sleep." One day, he was approached by the Queen who asked him if he wanted to be Prime Minister. He was astonished and immediately asked to see her signature. On seeing that he had been offered a job, which he could not do, he was extremely angry. After mentioning to the Queen that had he accepted the offer he would be the first Prime Minister to work for no pay, the Queen sadly agreed and told him that the last person she had recommended was the Hon. Richard Peel. Edmund became fascinated by politics and used the War Office to build up his network of influence. He was deeply involved in the formation of the Liberal Party and would jokingly declare that he could not see how the party could possibly fail, as it was founded by a Welshman, a Scotsman and a Greek. He was also known for having the ability to hold a conversation without making a single intelligent comment. However, he did have one professional accomplishment: he was the most highly paid public servant of his time. The Queen had called an election to try to regain the upper hand in Parliament. As the campaign began, Edmund decided to create a slogan: The Conservatives have been in power for five years. I'm sure it's time to change that. With the Conservatives in charge of the armed forces, Edmund also found himself in charge of the strategic defences against invasion. The danger of invasion never actually materialized, but Edmund passed on his concerns to the public. This
